1.1 Passage 1 (seen)

This story is worth a retell. The king is ill and the medicine men don't know why. Someone suggests that the king wear a happy man's shirt for a night. Soldiers are dispatched to find a happy man. It is a long and arduous search; no one is willing to claim he is happy. The soldiers zoom in on a guy singing happily under a tree. "Are you happy?" they ask. The man smiles and nods. "Will you give your shirt to the ailing king?" He replies, "But I don't have a shirt!"

Here is one chase in which we are united: the pursuit of happiness. Never mind it is intangible, impermanent and elusive. Never mind gurus, governments and guys in the street have different interpretations of what it is. The American Declaration of Independence lists the pursuit of happiness, along with life and liberty as an "unalienable right", endowed by the Creator. Bhutan measures its wealth in terms of a per-capita happiness index. People fill websites discussing it.

You can't buy happiness, but you can at least inherit it, said British and Australian researchers, after studying a thousand pairs of identical and non-identical twins. Their Eureka! on happiness is: Genes control half the personality traits that make people happy, while factors such as relationships, health and careers are responsible for the rest of our well-being.

- a) What is the paradox in the story narrated in the passage?
- b) How are we bound to each other according to the author?
- c) "You can't buy happiness, but you can at least inherit it." Comment.
- d) Find out the word/phrase from the passage which means "individuality".
- e) Find out the word/phrase from the passage which means "chasing".

- g) Use the expression "endowed by" in the sentence of your own.

1.2 Passage 2 (unseen)

A 3,222gt general cargo vessel arrived in port and by 1830 was secured alongside. With cargo discharge not due to start until 0600 the following morning, the crew were stood down with just one seaman doing a "night aboard." Although some crew members went ashore, most, including two Superintendents who were on board, retired to their cabins. Those who had gone ashore returned by midnight. The Chief Engineer and the Watchkeeper stayed up watching TV, until about 0130 when the Chief Engineer retired to his cabin, leaving just the watchkeeper awake and preparing some food in the galley.

At about 0310, the fire alarm sounded. Investigation indicated a fire in the upper engine room, steering gear, or separator room, although smoke was evident in the accommodation. The general alarm was sounded, shore authorities informed, and the ship's whistle sounded. Further investigation by the Chief Engineer established there was little or no smoke in the engine room. However, when he checked the accommodation fan room he found it full of smoke. Realizing the fire was in the accommodation, he retired to the open deck where the master confirmed that four seamen were missing. The Chief Officer, wearing an SCBA set, rescued two seamen from their cabins, while other officers found one of the Supritendents unconscious, behind his cabin door. With the Watchman unaccounted for and thick smoke found in the mess room, the master and chief officer, both wearing SCBA sets, entered the area to carry out a search. They found the galley door shut but radiating intense heat. They eventually found the missing seaman, unconscious, on the port side.

Two fire-fighters, who meanwhile had boarded the vessel, assisted in removing the seaman to the open deck, but he later died. Further investigation confirmed that the seat of the fire was the galley stove. The source was overheated cooking oil in a chip pan that had been placed on top of the galley stove. The result of this fire in human terms was one dead, three crew members requiring a lengthy period of convalescence, and three others suffering from smoke inhalation. In financial terms, the fire caused considerable smoke and heat damage to the galley and mess room, and minor smoke damage to the accommodation and service spaces.
